A NEW ROVEL or first Printed in Amer By the Authoress of " Mary Possel."

At this instant, Franz—who, while his mind was thus pre-cocupied, had unwittingly followed the path by which Rudelf had gone to the chalet instead of that by which he had returned from it—suddenly came upon the two bears, who instantly pursued him; and in his hurry and affright, he was precipated down a steep acclivity, down which he pitched ever and over, till he found himself several hundred feet below his shage, yearming several hundred feet below his shaggy enamine bruised and breathless, but not seriously hund. The search which was being made for Spend-bacher, all this time, was quite as vigorous as for Hofer. Minute descriptions of his person and dress were published, large rewards offered for his apprehension; and every nook and cor-ner esgerly searched for him by cruel and ner eagerly searched for him by cruel and greedy enemies.

Speckbacher, en separating from his contrades had first concealed himself in the little mountain hamlet of Dux; but his retreat being discovered, he was obliged to retire from the haunts of mun, and was hunted from place to place, till at length he found refuge in heights hitherto deemed inaccessible save to the engle and valuture. Here he underweat incre lible sufferings from cold, hunger and fatigue; but his indomifrom cold, hunger and fatigue; but his indomiable nature made him prefer it to submission

When Hofer returned to his chalet after the When Hofer returned to his chalet after the encounter with Franz, his wife observed, "I really do think, Anderi, it is now time you should cut of your beard. It makes you unlike everybody else; and, therefore, easily recognizable at a distance; whereas, should a spy to whom you are personally unknown, find his way up here, you, without your beard, might easily personade him you were somebody else."

"No, that would be the hardest thing in the world to me," said Hofer. "He might deceive himself about me; but I could not deceive him. Whenever a man has put to me the question, 'Are you Hofer?' I have never yet said 'No;' and I cannot begin now."

Anna was going to remonstrate; but he Anna was going to remonstrate; but he emiled rather saily at her and said—
'It would be to little good, dear—we are already discovered by Frarz.

Here Johann burst into a loud fit of crying, and flung himself on the straw; while Anna stood speechless.

"We had better go somewhere else, then, said she, after a moment.
"Where? We dare not descend into the valleys; and if we stray about the mountains, Rudolf will not know where to find us, and we shall perish with hunger. Patience, dear wife! Ru fulf may come again in a few days, and we may then concert fresh measures with him; or the emperor's safeguard may arrive in the meantime, and we can then avail ourselves of it."

"Ah, I hope we shall!"

clare, if I espy any one prowling about that has no business here, I'll see if I can't manage to hit him mayself!"

Just four everings after his previous visit, Rudolf reappeared. He did not think their provisions could fall short yet; but he was anxious about Franz, and he thought Hofer and his wife wanted cheering up, and would be glad to know the message to the emperor was already on its way; so he started with a fresh filled basket.

This time he met with no interruptions, and had a presperous journey; he had also the comfort of finding his friends cheerful and hopeful. They talked about his marriage with Theresa in the spring; the household goods they would start with and those which they must provide; and many a sage maxim of thrifty housewifery did Anna repeat and Hofer lauge at and Rudolf promised to bear faithfully in housewifery did Anna repeat and Hofer laugh at, and Rudolf premised to bear faithfully in mind. The evening, as usual, concluded with prayer. Hofer was in the habit of praying ex-tempore and with great ferver, after they all joined in singing several simple hymns of a great many verses, and then lay down for the might.

Rudolf, as usual, rlept with Johann is the loft. He was tired with his journey, and the evening had altoge her been more satisfactory than he expected; yet somehow, he could not settle to sleep. The conversation respecting his marriage had been too interesting and exciting to enable him to compose himself; a ld to which, he had a vague fear of some evil impending over the Sandwitch, for which he seemed to have no need.

When he slept by statches, it was to dram painfully: of These a being borne from him by Franz over cracking he becauth which they both disappeared—of nears growing over her remains—of the engage wis state coming tow late—of lifer's but being attached as dead of night—of the arr ringary with the sharp remarks of reference in a transfer himself.

Springing to hisfeet, he shouted to Hofer below,—"The enemy are enus!" and least from the loft window to the ground, followed by the dizzy Johann, when both were immediately seized and bound. The challet was encircled by sixteen hundred French soldiers, come to capture one unfortunate man.

The next instant, the chalet-door was opened from within; and there stood the mild Hofe.

The commandar', Captain Remound, here stepped forward, accompanied by a genderme, and said, hurriedly—

"Are you Andreas Hofer?"
"Iam."

The clear voice rang through the air. Turning to his wife, Johann, and Rudolf, he said,— "These have offended in nothing; let them not be bound."

Then, addressing those whom he loved so deeply, he said—

Captain Renouard entered the chalet for a moment, looked around, shrugged his shoulders, saw the noted rid; standing in the corner and brought it at shrugged his shoulders, saw the noted rifts standing in the corner, and brought it out.

"This is a clumsy piece, after all," said he, handing it to the gendarme, after surveying it somewhat curiously. "Take care! it's loade!!" dodging it in some alarm, as the gendarme handled it carelessly, it would have been singular if he had been shot by ifofer's rift after all—the rifte that II for would not fire in his own duence.

their safety. Here they enjoyed the last snatch of unrestrained family intercourse they were destined to have on earth, it was embittered from many sources, but yet it had its sweetness. Their friends also had access to them; and many of the townspeople of Botzen came to express their sympathy—of whom Hofer asked forgiveness for anything they might have to impute to him; but he was only answered by their tears. Some of them were surpised to behold the serenity of his countenance, as he conversed with his family, and gave them various directions concerning affairs small as well as great. There seemed no end to the people te whom hy charged them to give messages of kind remembrance; often with some allusion to this one's weedling, or that one's illness, which showed that his head was quite clear enough to keep in view their minute affairs.

At length the hour of parting came, the last embrace was given, the last kirs taken, though not the last tear wept by many; when he consigned his wife and children, in the companionship of Rudoif, to the appointed excort of French soldiers who were to see them safely to am Sand, and restore all the property that had soon be among us again!" were the last words that burst from Rudolf, as he clasped his friend that burst from Kudolf, as he clasped his friend in his arms, and then hurried away with tears streaming down his checks.

After the heart-breaking separation, one or two officers, with kindly feelings, would have interrupted Hofer's solitude; but he middly requested to be left to himself. His guards said he prayed; whether he wept, they did not are.

Say.

After a short interval of repose, he was sent, under a strong escort, to Mantua, and confined in a prison near the Porta Molina, already crowded by many Tyrolese.

He was speedily tried by a court-martial, which sat in the Palazza d'Arco. Its president was General Bisson, already embittered against him and his cause by his own defeat. On comwas General Bisson, already embittered against him and his cause by his own defeat. On comparing the votes, a great difference of opinion was found as to the nature of his sentence. The majority were for simple confinement; one or two had the courage to vote for his complete acquittal; but a telegraph from Milan decided the question by decroeing death in twenty-four hours—thus putting the mediation of Austria beyond his reach.

CHAPTER XXI

TYRANNY RAMPANT, GRACE TRIUMPHANT. Hofer, though not expecting so sudden a doom, received the announcement of it with fortitude. "Let me see a priest," said he.

Father Manifesti, a dignified and venerable man, immediately came to him, and remained with him to the hour of his death.

with him to the hour of his death.

The greater part of the night was spent in devotional exercises; the remainder m conversing on the war; in the course of which, Hofer expressed his firm conviction that the Tyrol must and would eventually revert to Austria. He also penned the following letter to an old friend and neighbor in the Passeyrthal:

" MY VERY DEAR BROTHER "It is the will of God, that here, at Man-tua, I change a mortal for an etarati state. But, thanks be to God! this step appears as But, thanks be to God! this step appears as easy to me as if it were to conduct me elsewhere; and He will, doubtless, support me, and conduct me safely to the end, that my soul may join the company of the elect, in that place where it may be permitted to me to implore his mercy towards all those so dear to me here below; those, especially, whose kindnesses have reached me. You, yourself, my very dear friend, and your wife, are included among the latter; and my thanks are yours for the little book, and for many things else. Pray for me!—you and all the dear friends who yet live in the world! I am leaving,—pray for me! that I may be delivered from the purgatory where I must otherwise, perhaps, suffer for my sins.
